Sculpture takes on new dimensions in this issue, as artists transform ordinary materials into extraordinary creations. From intricate carvings that seem to breathe life into stone to abstract forms that challenge our perceptions, each sculpture is a testament to the sculptor's vision and craftsmanship.

A contemporary sculpture that sparks conversations about form, texture, and the passage of time.

Photography, in its myriad forms, captures the beauty and complexity of the world around us. From stunning landscapes that transport us to distant realms to intimate portraits that reveal the human condition, each photograph is a testament to the photographer's keen eye and ability to capture a fleeting moment.

A Tapestry of Literary Expressions

The Blue Rose Magazine Issue 07 is not merely a showcase of visual arts; it is also a literary haven, a sanctuary for the written word. Within its pages, readers will encounter a diverse collection of poetry, fiction, and essays that explore the depths of human emotion, challenge societal norms, and inspire new ways of thinking.

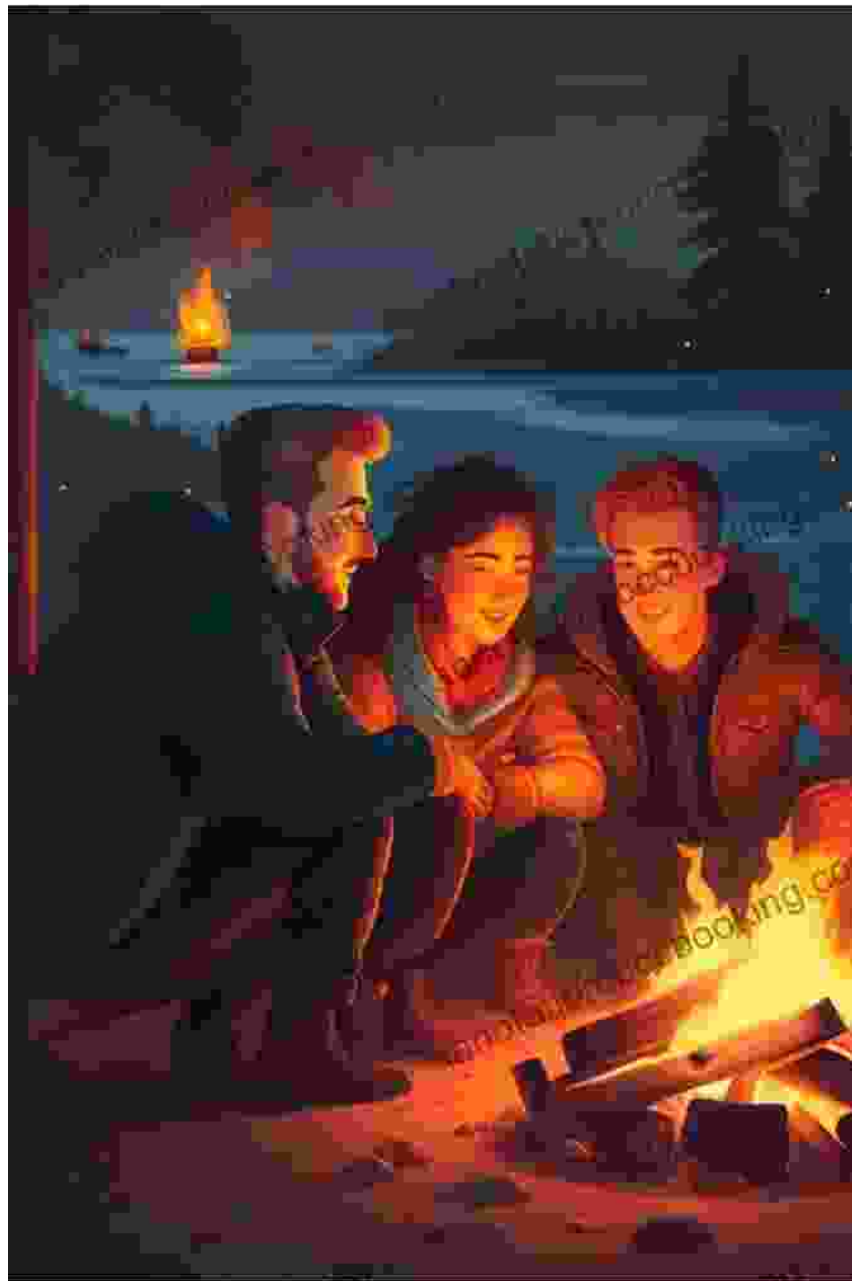

Poets weave words into intricate tapestries, crafting verses that resonate with truth, beauty, and longing. Their words paint vivid pictures in our minds, evoke powerful emotions, and leave us pondering the mysteries of life.

A poem that delves into the complexities of the human heart, exploring themes of love, loss, and the search for meaning.

Fiction, in its various forms, transports us to different worlds, introduces us to unforgettable characters, and challenges our understanding of reality. Short stories and novel excerpts delve into the human psyche, exploring the complexities of relationships, the struggles of everyday life, and the indomitable spirit that resides within us.

Essays, both personal and analytical, offer thought-provoking insights into a wide range of topics, from the nature of creativity to the challenges facing our society. These essays are written by leading thinkers, artists, and cultural commentators, and they provide a platform for intellectual discourse and critical reflection.

interpreting our relationship with technology." (20) He nevertheless believes that Frankenstein is the "inventing myth of modern biology" (21). It is the narrative of this myth that has managed to insert itself and reproduce itself in the very structures of contemporary society that under the "mad science" scene (20) or the public's use of popular cultural metaphors linked to common themes associated with Victor Frankenstein such as tampering with nature, to form negative opinions in the "debate about science and technology, about what research is desirable or permissible" (20). This association, Turney argues, has had a negative effect on the development of genetics but due to the deeply interwoven nature of the narrative the reference to Frankenstein is an inescapable feature of public discourse on science. He suggests that because of this feature the debate seems to be polarized to simple 'yes' or 'no' answers on what genetics should or should not be allowed by research and instead believes complex answers are needed in order for the field to advance.

It is from this position that Andy Miah argues that the complexities of "posthumanism offers such a discourse" (7). For as Hayles suggests, "Although some current versions of the posthuman point toward the antihuman and the apocalyptic, we can craft others that will be conducive to the long-range survival of humans and of the other life-forms, biological and artificial, with whom we share the planet and ourselves" (20). Indeed, Hayles believes that the artificial and the neoposthuman "do not exhaust the meanings of the posthuman" (28). In this respect Mary Shelley's Frankenstein and in particular the monster as a figure of the posthuman can be seen to demonstrate these complexities inherent in the discourse of posthumanism. For far too often as Hindle suggests "the Creature's narrative, so vital to the moral underpinning of the whole work, has been ignored in so many of the theatrical and filmic re-workings of the story ... the moral-political argument of Mary's story has often simply been left out, unwanted by an audience which prefers the more frightening (and 'simpler') genre of a threatening monster" (Hindle xxvii). Indeed, although the posthuman is intertwined with scientific and technological progress this does not necessarily spell a posthumanist future where humans are superseded by cyborgs, aliens, artificial intelligence or some genetically engineered species. Instead contemporary visions of posthumanism are informed by conversations on cyborgs or automata, which have often involved a reflective stance on humanity's distinct and recent place in the world. In this fashion a central premise of posthumanism is its critical stance towards the prominence afforded to humanity in the natural order. In this sense, the 'post' of posthumanism need not imply the absence of humanity or moving beyond it in some biological or evolutionary manner. Rather, the starting point should be an attempt to understand what has been omitted from an anthropocentric worldview, which includes coming to terms with how the Enlightenment's view of humanity has been revealed as inadequate.

In this respect, Mary Shelley's Frankenstein encodes a script in the sense that Turney suggests the
