One of the stories in the book tells of Game Warden John Smith, who was called to investigate a report of a bear that was terrorizing a local campground. Smith tracked the bear to a nearby den, where he found a sow with two cubs. Smith knew that the sow was likely defending her cubs, so he approached the den slowly and carefully. He was able to get close enough to the sow to tranquilize her, and then he and his team were able to safely remove the cubs from the den. The cubs were then taken to a wildlife rehabilitation center, where they were cared for until they were old enough to be released back into the wild.

Another story in the book tells of Game Warden Jane Doe, who was called to investigate a report of a deer that had been hit by a car. Doe found the deer lying in the road, and she knew that it was badly injured. She called for assistance, and a team of wildlife rehabilitators arrived to help her. The team was able to stabilize the deer's injuries, and they then transported it to a wildlife rehabilitation center. The deer was eventually released back into the wild, thanks to the efforts of Doe and her team.

These are just two of the many stories that are told in Wildlife Guardians: Stories of Pennsylvania Game Wardens. These stories are a testament to the dedication and hard work of the men and women who protect our state's wildlife. If you love wildlife, you'll love this book!
